The Registrar: Canada's Regulatory Sector Magazine

The Registrar is a trade and industry publication about consumer protection in Canada.

To be first published on March 1, 2021,

The Registrar is a digital publication featuring news, legislative updates, legal analyses, and other important regulatory information.

With a strong focus on human interest stories,

The Registrar will also profile regulators across the country whose careers are dedicated to protecting the public interest. The publication will also feature regulated professionals recognized for their exemplary leadership in their respective industries and communities and explore the lives of Canadian consumers and patients.

The editorial team consists of an impressive, diverse, and highly qualified panel of professional journalists across Canada with track records delivering insightful, engaging, and thought-provoking business and human-interest stories for Canada's leading print and digital publications. This team promises to increase the visibility and recognition of the Canadian regulatory sector with a unique lens that appeals to staff, industry professionals, and the general public.

The Registrar: Canada's Regulatory Sector Magazine

In Canada, there are dozens of regulated professions, meaning that by law, a license is required to practise that profession.

To become a professional of a regulated occupation, people are required to meet high academic qualifications, usually pass an exam administered or approved by the regulatory body, and have their professional conduct monitored once in the occupation. People can also be removed from an occupation if their professional conduct fails to meet the profession's standards. If removed, it is illegal for them to continue practising that profession and consequences for illegal practise can range from significant fines to serving jail time.

The role of Canadian professional licensing and regulatory bodies is critical, and The Registrar aims to increase their profile in the interest of further protecting Canadian consumers and patients.

The Role of Regulatory Bodies

In Canada, there are a number of different kinds of regulatory bodies. Some are government agencies and others are self-regulated. The Registrar primarily focuses on self-regulating organizations.

Self-regulating organizations are typically established by a provincial or territorial government, and their primary goals are to protect the public by enforcing legislation and codes of conduct that oversee a specific profession.

They do this by:

- Setting the standards of entry into a profession, which includes determining the type of education required and administering or approving an entrance exam once the training has been completed;

- Enforcing professional conduct by ensuring legislation and codes of conduct are followed; and
- Overseeing and managing a complaints and discipline process which includes investigating allegations against professionals, managing disputes and tribunals, and determining whether any punitive actions should be taken against a professional which could range from skills training to removal from the profession.
